As Red Ants Pants

continues to evolve and grow, Calhoun expects to expand her business in Montana, keeping true to her unique niche marketing.

"We won't ever be found in retail stores," she said. "Being on tour gives us an opportunity to work side by side and support working women - and get out of the truck for a while.

"I always want to meet my customers and hear what they think about the pants. That's really important to me."

As for Langton, she was thrilled to have enthusiastic extra help on Tuesday, and to be inspired by Calhoun, a woman who had the courage to follow a dream.

"I know what I'm doing is unusual," Langton said.

"Most women who get divorced and have a child wouldn't embark on building a house out of garbage.

"But I'm doing this to ensure my family will be able to live here for many more generations."
