Red Ants Pants

Think of them as something Indiana Jones would wear if he were a gardener—and a woman. "I was fed up with not finding heavy work pants that fit," says former Outward Bound instructor and trail crew leader Sarah Calhoun. So the 28-year-old Montana entrepreneur started Red Ants Pants, focusing on rugged work wear sized to a woman's body. The reinforced, deep-pocketed pants are just right for heavy-duty spring cleanup chores; their tough material lasts, and the rich brown color hides all kinds of grime. Best of all, the pants are sold by waist and inseam measurement in both a curvy cut and a straight cut, resulting in a near-custom fit.
